Welcome to the Xamarin Forums. You must sign in and register to post, and we can help you do that now. Folly Cove Folly Cove is a village in eastern Newfoundland, Canada, in the district of Labrador. Its name comes from the belief of the natives who believe that a huge rock has metamorphosed out of a slab of granite. The village of Folly Cove was home to a small Métis community until their population started to decline. The Metis moved to Trout River (now called South Brook) in 1965. The village of Folly Cove is an example of a pre-industrial Newfoundland village. History Folly Cove is located east of Cascumpec (East Brook). The locality was known as "Providence Cove". A parish was split off from it, with the new parish being named "Folly Cove" after Folly Cove, Devon, England. The people of Folly Cove, as well as their neighbours in Cascumpec (East Brook), and Trout River, were "among the most Métis-like of the Lisbethas" (lands) in Newfoundland. The Lisbethas "were composed of semi-nomadic groups whose people used their hunting grounds to graze their herds as the seasons dictated." These "would be wintering grounds" where they would also "seek shelter from the weather," living in "clan and family tents." The people of Folly Cove also left, turning more and more to the French "as fishers and missionaries" in the 17th century. The Lisbethas were "sabotaged" by the British in 1720 by their use of violence towards the Methodist missionaries. The British, who were opposed to the Methodist missionaries, used fire to destroy the homes of the Lisbethas. Those who had homes that were not burned returned to the area they came from. Years later, in the early 19th century, the Lisbethas still did not live in the Folly Cove area, having gone to the much more populated Hogan's Point. The original Lisbetha tribes were almost "completely assimilated" by the Métis and the French settlers of Newfoundland. There were 2 religious denominations involved: the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. See also List of communities in Newfoundland and Labrador
